When using PHP to execute user defined functions in a shared hosting environment, I can't use the common -i switch to install PHP with an Apache directive that allows remote users to execute PHP from the server. I need to change my PHP code so that by default it executes as the user "guest" (i.e. the "insecure" credentials that the administrator gives to "guests").

What I find most interesting is that the documentation for the -i switch, says that setting this switch modifies the "current user" to that user. The Apache docs says that the "current user" corresponds to a username of the form "NAME@HOSTNAME". So my question is, how do I get Apache to emulate this username? A: It's your SSL configuration. It's defaulting to the Apache username: httpd. If you just remove the default "ServerTokens Prod" setting, you'll see that it's set to the Apache usernames: ServerSignature On ServerTokens Prod The good thing about this is that it also serves as a reminder to check and clean your server's ssl config if it has a red warning mark when SSL is enabled.

Good Food Saison's Approach to the Kitchen "No one person or concept can perfectly embody a restaurant's soul or perfectly articulate what was going on in its psyche when it opened. Our experience was one of those rare restaurants where many different people were brought together. We had the best investors, the best designers, the best restaurant runners, the best chefs, the best sommelier, the best mixologists, the best bartenders, the best servers, the best directors, the best marketing, the best PR and of course we had the best food. With that said, I still felt like we were learning all the time. We knew that if we prepared in a fresh way, we'd have

A universal standard for every business, digital by default, a country that works for everyone and not just the few, a level playing field for all. These are a few of the main messages that the release of the report, Investing in Britain's Future, issued today by the Interim Leaders Group and ahead of the release of the final report in the autumn. The Interim Leaders Group – made up of 16 political parties, most of the biggest employers, and the Church of England – has been working since March on a long-term plan for Britain's future, with the support of three key bodies including the House of Lords Economic Affairs Committee, the Charities Aid Foundation and the Archbishop of Canterbury's Commission on Economic Justice. Our report lays out a blueprint for how the next Government should build an economy that works for everyone. It shows how we can achieve growth, creating jobs, strengthening the places we live in and improving our environment, while taking the huge financial challenges we face head on, and ensuring we leave the world a better place than we found it. It also says that the problem that Britain faces is that we are in the middle of a big transition. The big change to our economy in the past generation has been the rise of digital and automation, and it is this – rather than tax cuts or investment in infrastructure – that we must focus on in the next Government. This is the time to rethink the way we work and think about the world that we want to live in. The report goes into what we need to do and how we can do it. The UK's prosperity will be the product of how well we use the skills and talents of the people who live here, which means we must start thinking differently about our economy. Businesses can and must be part of the solution, but we need to create a new way of working, one that is better for the economy, and for our communities. Income inequality will continue to rise and threaten to become a fundamental fault line in our society, as well as causing instability in the UK, and damaging our competitiveness. We are not making the most of our potential. We are in the middle of a transition, and we have not yet fully
